AGRICULTURAL.

From the American Farmer. GREEN MANURING,

Or the Application of Vegetable Matter in the Green state.

From a knowledge gained by experience we have long since made up our mind, that Agriculturists place too low an estimate upon the advantages to be derived from the sowing of green crops to be ploughed in as a means of improving their lands. Few, if any, are able to make, by the ordinary process resorted to, a sufficient quantity to answer the demands of each succeeding spring; and from the remoteness at which they live from the large cities, it is impossible to obtain supplies thence .-Necessity, which is said to be the mother of invention, one would think, would long since have caused many to have turned their attention to this certain, and comparatively cheap mode; but such has not been the case. Those who have Clover levs to turn in, of course, stand in no need of a resort to this plan; but most certainly, those who have not advanced that far towards the melioration of the condition of their soils, should not hesitate in adopting this, the next best plan of driving sterility from their fields. Many we know there are, who have been prevented from entering into the clover culture because of the impoverished condition to which their lands have been reduced-to such we would say, that they should lay themselves out to enter upon the system of green manuring the next year. And with the view of bringing the rubject directly home to them, we shall make an extract from the Lecture of Professor James F. W. Johnson, of the University of Dublin-a gentleman of whom it is not saying too much to declare that as an agricultural chemist, he is not excelled by any one living. He says: "By green manuring is meant the plough-

Wazyck, in the neighborhood, fell into Chapel st., a distance of some one hundred and twenty-five yards, from the scene of disaster; the body of the boiler itself, near twenty-five feet in length, and weighing about two tons, however, took an opposite direction, passing through a small wooden building on the opposite side of the street, and in its course killing a colored man named John Lewis, who was sitting at his desk writing, actually dividing him in two. and scattering the weather boarding of the building in every direction. The boiler finally made a lodgment among a pile of wood on Macbeth's wharf, some of which was thrown against a white man named John Badricks, fracturing his left leg and breaking his right arm. The mill itself is much injured by the explosion, but we understand the proprietor has already commenced clearing away the fragments, preparatory to placing another boiler in the place of the one destroyed, which is stated to have been about six months in use
